Since the adoption of Ministerial Council Decision No. 3 (2011) on “Elements of the Conflict Cycle”, the OSCE has significantly improved its conflict cycle toolbox, including its capacities to react swiftly to emerging conflict and crisis situations. Yet, there is room for further enhancing the capabilities for conflict prevention and resolution, including through increased co-operation with relevant civil society actors. Moreover, the session will focus on the contribution of women to sustainable peace and security, specifically through their inclusion in any initiative aimed at preventing and resolving conflict. These envoys support the Chairmanship in its efforts to prevent and resolve conflict as well as in post-conflict rehabilitation and peacebuilding. Such efforts can enhance security and build confidence. These conflicts are characterized by unique aspects (and covered in corresponding formats) - the Transnistrian conflict (Transnistrian Settlement Process); the conflict in Georgia (Geneva International Discussions); the Nagorno-Karabakh conflict (dealt with by the OSCE Minsk Conference) - and remain significant challenges for the OSCE and its participating States. Special attention will be paid to the implementation of OSCE norms, principles and commitments and the OSCE’s role, in particular through more substantial support to the respective conflict settlement mechanisms. This will include exchanges about root causes and triggers for violent extremism and radicalisation leading to terrorism (VERLT) and possible ways of enhancing the OSCE’s capacities to address these and their
