High Commissioner on National Minorities

Who we are

A society can be divided by ethnicity, religion, language, or a combination of these. If social cohesion is weakened, divisions can lead to tensions and even conflict. In recognition of this challenge, the High Commissioner on National Minorities was established in 1992 as an institution to address ethnic tensions and to prevent conflict between or within states over national minority issues.

The High Commissioner is mandated to “assess at the earliest possible stage the role of the parties directly concerned, the nature of the tensions and recent developments therein and, where possible, the potential consequences for peace and stability” within the OSCE area.

The High Commissioner therefore provides early warning and, as appropriate, early action in regard to tensions involving national minority issues that have the potential to develop into a conflict within the OSCE area, affecting peace, stability, or relations between participating States.

The mandate is essentially two-fold: to work to contain and de-escalate tensions, and to alert the OSCE's participating States and executive structures when a situation threatens to develop beyond a level which the High Commissioner is able to contain with the diplomatic means at the institution's disposal.

The mandate allows the High Commissioner, who is based in The Hague, considerable independence. The decision as to where and when to become engaged in a situation is left to the discretion of the High Commissioner and does not require the approval of the state concerned or of OSCE decision-making bodies, such as the Permanent Council. This independence is crucial to the flexibility of the High Commissioner's involvement.

As an instrument of conflict prevention within the politico-military dimension of the OSCE, the High Commissioner is not intended to function as an ombudsman for national minorities or as an investigator of individual human rights violations.

The HCNM has been helping to boost the capacity of minorities to broadcast news in their native language, one of many projects aimed at increasing the participation of national minorities in the life of wider society.

The Central Asia Education Programme promotes mother tongue-based multilingual education. It helps achieve a balance between ensuring fluency in the State language while also preserving and accommodating minority languages and identities.

What we do

The High Commissioner is empowered to conduct on-site missions and to engage in preventive diplomacy. This involves extensive travelling and regular contact with minority and government representatives. The High Commissioner also promotes dialogue, confidence and co-operation.

The High Commissioner interprets conflict prevention both in an operational and a structural way, combining a short-term approach of quiet diplomacy with a long-term perspective in order to achieve sustainable solutions and address the root causes of conflict.

Quiet diplomacy

The mandate emphasizes that the High Commissioner must work in confidence. This confidentiality, or quiet diplomacy, serves several purposes.

Firstly, it is designed to alleviate any suspicion or stigmatization that governments may feel by having the High Commissioner involved in what are often highly sensitive issues.

Secondly, keeping issues away from press and public scrutiny reduces the potential for these issues to be sensationalized or misrepresented and makes it easier to broker agreements. Despite this, the High Commissioner endeavours to be as transparent as possible, and speeches, news and publications are publically available.

While working independently and confidentially, the High Commissioner is nevertheless accountable to the OSCE participating States. The High Commissioner regularly briefs the Permanent Council, both formally and informally, keeps the Chairperson-in-Office informed and works closely with other OSCE and international institutions. This gives the High Commissioner the political support necessary to fulfil the mandate.

Long-term perspective

The High Commissioner's goal is to start, maintain and enhance the dialogue and co-operation between the parties, leading to concrete steps calculated to not only de-escalate tensions but, if possible, resolve underlying problems or grievances.

The High Commissioner provides advice to governments in the form of written recommendations and at meetings and discussions during visits. This engagement is seldom limited to a single visit or letter; it is usually followed up with further advice, including assistance with developing legal and policy frameworks. To help the participating States implement the recommendations, the High Commissioner conducts targeted, small-scale projects such as, for instance, projects that focus on multilingual education and minorities' political participation.

The first ever children's illustrated Macedonian-Albanian/Albanian-Macedonian dictionary for primary schools will help overcome language barriers and prevent segregation in education, thus bridging linguistic divides in society.

Every two years, the HCNM presents the Max van der Stoep Award of 50,000 euros to an individual, group or institution for outstanding work in improving the position of national minorities in the OSCE area.

The High Commissioner

Ambassador Lamberto Zannier, an Italian career diplomat since 1978, is the fifth OSCE High Commissioner on National Minorities. He took up the position on 19 July 2017.

Zannier formerly served as OSCE Secretary General from July 2011 until June 2017. Previous senior positions include UN Special Representative for Kosovo and Head of the UN Interim Administration Mission in Kosovo (2008-2011); Director of the OSCE Conflict Prevention Centre (2002-2006); Chairperson of the negotiations on the adaptation of the Treaty on Conventional Armed Forces in Europe (1998-1999) and Head of Disarmament, Arms Control and Cooperative Security at NATO (1991-1997).
