Staff

The teaching staff consists of 8 leading scholars and practitioners in the field of parties and democracy from European and American universities and international organizations.

Teaching format

The Summer School comprises an intensive programme of lectures and seminars by leading scholars and practitioners in the field, and presentations with in-depth discussions of participants' projects. The teaching language will be English. The Summer School contains 7 teaching days, each of which is organised around a topical research question related to the overall theme of the Summer School. Each day will comprise two main elements, each of which is scheduled to last three and a half hours. The overall number of class contact hours will thus be 50.

The first element consists of a presentation by a staff member on a specific topic related to the theme of the Summer School. This will be followed by a question-and-answer session. The second element consists of presentations by participants of their projects (which may, but do not have to be part of their PhD research). Each of these presentations will be followed by rigorous discussion (approximately 30 minutes) with all other participants and staff. Each day up to three participants will present their work.

Assessment and accreditation

Each participant fulfilling the above-mentioned requirements will receive a certificate of participation.

On special request, PhD researchers' papers may be assessed and credited by staff members of the Summer School. The credits awarded for successful participation and assessment will be 6.5 European Credit Transfer System (ECTS) credits. PhD researchers wishing to have their work accredited are advised to consult the directors of the Summer School at an early stage.
