High-level opening session: Local approaches to global challenges

Cities are often at the forefront in addressing many of today’s transnational security challenges, including terrorism and violent extremism, organized crime, climate change, disasters, and mass movements of people. Yet as the complexity, scale and interconnectedness of these challenges continue to grow, cities are seldom called upon to contribute to national, regional or global policymaking addressing these issues. In view of the pace and scale of urbanization, cities should play a more prominent role in security policy discussions.

Inclusive cities: Building integrated and cohesive societies

Diversity is a major attraction of urban life, but it can also be a challenge for cities to build a cohesive society. Inclusive cities need to ensure that all individuals and groups have a sense of belonging, are integrated and connected, able to participate in public life, can influence local decision-making and enjoy recognition for their interests. By respecting and promoting diversity, cities can harness the potential inherent in diverse populations in terms of ideas, skills and connections to the wider world. Where inclusion fails, however, socioeconomic segregation and marginalization can pose serious risks to social cohesion and public safety, and lead to tensions and even conflict between groups. In light of continuing large scale movements of people from neighboring regions into Europe, the interaction or lack thereof between local people, long-time resident migrant communities and recent arrivals deserves particular attention.

Safe cities: Reducing risks posed by transnational challenges

Many cities across the OSCE area are looking for effective ways to reduce risks posed by various transnational threats such as terrorism, violent extremism, organized crime or trafficking. Globalization and rapid urbanization have led to unprecedented expansion of many cities, creating a number of security-related implications for ordinary citizens. Mayors and municipal policymakers must work in partnership with both national and local actors from various sectors, including law enforcement, civil society, local associations (including women, youth and religious leaders), and the media to protect communities and vulnerable individuals from these risks.

Sustainable cities: Promoting sustainable development through good governance and green policies

Rapid urbanization is putting city authorities under enormous pressure as they seek to maintain high-quality public services and create new economic opportunity for an expanding population. In times of growing income inequality, fuelled by technological change in a globalizing world, the economic viability, social cohesion and security of cities depend greatly on how they are run. Good governance is key to making best use of limited resources and to achieving popular support for forward-looking policies that can unlock the economic potential of cities in a sustainable way.

Cities are also deeply vulnerable to environmental challenges from climate change and natural and man-made disasters. Weak infrastructure and services, as well as a lack of proper urban planning, can exacerbate such vulnerabilities and increase tensions. Conversely, good environmental governance, sustainable and participatory urban management, effective policies for disaster risk reduction and targeted investments can mitigate them and contribute to peaceful communities. The dynamism of cities as places of opportunity and hope also nurtures innovative approaches and partnerships for addressing environmental challenges.
In a rapidly urbanizing world, cities are often in the forefront in addressing a wide array of security challenges that are often interlinked and transcend national borders. Many cities are organizing themselves, building national, regional and global partnerships and exploring new ways of co-operating with civil society and the private sector. Regional organizations such as the OSCE can play an important role in facilitating an inclusive dialogue among relevant local, national and international actors and in strengthening the resilience of cities in addressing global security challenges.
